When It Rains ... It's A Million Dollar Problem

A rainstorm is usually just a minor inconvenience. But for a television sports director covering a golf tournament, a rainstorm can wash out several months and half a million dollars worth of preparation.

Imagine the dilemma of Harry Coyle, NBC sports director for the recent Bay Hill Citrus Classic, as he watched the clouds gather over his tournament. He had been preparing five months for these two days. In place and ready for work were 12 stationary cameras, 3 mobile cameras, 9 towers, one forklift, one 90 ft. crane, and 150 crew members.

As a veteran of many tournaments, Coyle remained calm but watchful.

The skies had been a typical Florida blue during the Viceroy Rich Lights Pro/Am that immediately preceded the Classic. But on Saturday, the first day of TV coverage, the sky had turned overcast.

A director knows that even cloudy skies are a problem. A white ball in the air against a bright, blue background is highly visible. However, a white ball silhouetted against a dark, overcast sky appears black and may be difficult to follow.

On Sunday the sky turned from overcast to threatening. Lightening flashed in the distance. A wary Coyle was ready to pull his men from the towers at any moment. Play continued as the storm approached. But it was almost a photo-finish between Bob Byman's sudden death victory at the 15th hole and the sudden cloud burst that would have put an end to play.

Rain is not the only threat to a tournament. The winds that sprang up on Saturday at Bay Hill caused more than a few balls to fall short of the green. However, for cameramen who had survived the Hawaiian Open, the winds at Bay Hill were scarcely noticeable. In Hawaii, one cameraman had his safety pants torn from him by a gust of wind, and two men had to hold down one camera so that coverage could continue.

In the end, the threatening storm at the Citrus Classic was just one more factor responsible for making it such an exciting tournament. In Coyle's opinion, a dull tournament, with a run-away winner, is the hardest kind to cover. When this happens, the director must devise ways of keeping the interest of the viewers. On the other hand, a tension-filled, down-to-the-wire match is easy to cover. Spectator involvement, the reaction of spouses and the players themselves combine for an exciting performance.

Lack of excitement was not a problem at Bay Hill. In fact, NBC had taped some early holes, intending to show them at a slow point in the final match. However, the contenders were so close, and the natural excitement so intense, that there was never any need for the tapes.

UNDERSTANDING MENTAL HEALTH

a health column from the

Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration

U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare

The Angry Child

Handling children's anger can be puzzling, draining, and distressing for adults. In fact, one of the major problems in dealing with anger in children is the difficulty in handling the anger that is often stirred up in the parent. It has been said that parents, teachers, counselors, and administrators need to remind themselves that they were not always taught how to deal with anger as a fact of life during their own childhood. They may have been led to believe that to be angry was to be bad and perhaps made to feel guilty for expressing anger.

Experts say it is easier to deal with children's anger if the adult can get rid of the notion that anger is "bad." The goal is not to repress or destroy angry feelings in children—or in adults—but rather to accept the feelings and to help channel and direct them to constructive ends.

Parents and teachers must allow children to express all their emotions. Adult skills can then be directed toward showing children acceptable ways of expressing their emotions. Strong feelings cannot be denied, and angry outbursts should not always be viewed as a sign of serious problems; they should be recognized and treated with respect.

To respond effectively to overly aggressive behavior in children we need to have some ideas about what may have triggered an outburst. Anger may be a defense to avoid painful feelings; it may be associated with failure, low self-esteem, and feelings of isolation; or it may be related to anxiety about situations over which the child has no control.

Angry defiance may also be associated with feelings of dependency; anger may be associated with sadness and depression. In childhood, anger and sadness are very close to one another, and it is important to remember that much of what an adult experiences as sadness is expressed by a child as anger.

If you are interested in learning more about this subject, you may wish to write for a copy of "Plain Talk about Dealing with the Angry Child," publication number 645G, available from the Consumer Information Center, Pueblo, Colorado 81009. The brochure was prepared by the National Institute of Mental Health, which is part of the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration, DHEW.

The most effective safety belt is the combination lap-shoulder harness, but even the lap belt alone will help to keep you safe.

Seat belts already are saving more than 3,000 lives each year, and between 7,000 and 8,000 more lives could be saved each year if safety belts were always buckled.

The lap-shoulder belt combination protects passengers in crashes above 60 miles per hour. Deaths occur at speeds as low as 12 miles per hour when safety belts are not worn.

A large majority of motor vehicle crashes occur within 25 miles of home, frequently at neighborhood intersections, and at speeds of under 40 miles per hour. Most of the injuries and deaths in these accidents could be avoided if safety belts are used.

The arms of a parent are not strong enough to restrain and protect a small child even in low-speed crashes. If the parent is not wearing a belt, he or she may be thrown forward. For maximum protection, an infant or young child should ride in a specially designed infant carrier or child restraint that is secured by the safety belts already in the motor vehicle.

Less than 20 per cent of motor vehicle occupants bother to buckle up. Even worse, only about 7 per cent of infants and young children are properly protected while riding in motor vehicles.

Seat Belts Save Lives

Motor vehicle crashes claim almost 50,000 lives each year, and injuries number in the millions. Most of the deaths and serious injuries can be prevented by the regular use of seat belts.

Scientific research, including actual crashes under controlled conditions, proves that safety belts can be extremely effective in protecting you and your family, says a pamphlet from the

"THE ROSE"

As I was strolling down a leafy lane,
Upon one Sabbath morn,
I spied a pretty rose among the thistles and the thorn,
I took the rose and pressed it to my nose,
Within each worried heart, there is a hidden rose,
That seems like briars or weeds.
But with a touch of faith the Lord, our righteousness, will give us faith to suit our needs,
Now this is an object lesson of what the Lord can do,
I thought I would not keep it to myself, but pass it on to you.
